Dear Friends,

As a Trustee of the Helmsley Charitable Trust, I traveled to Ethiopia for the first time six years ago. One of today’s fastest growing economies in sub-Saharan Africa, the country is at a promising inflection point, yet poverty remains widespread. And, while poverty is often defined by low income or consumption levels, it is further complicated - and harder to escape - when accompanied by a lack of education, health care, and basic infrastructure.

This multi-dimensional view of poverty, espoused by the World Bank in Piecing Together the Poverty Puzzle, highlights the need for holistic interventions and robust investments in human capital. For Helmsley, investing our philanthropic dollars in these kinds of solutions, which will lead to a better future for vulnerable communities, is what drew me to SOS Children’s Villages.

In 2014, Helmsley first partnered with SOS Children’s Villages to ensure children’s health and well-being through education, essential services, and capacity building of caregivers. The $10 million initiative, EduCare, will impact more than 50,000 people in the Amhara region by 2021. Its first phase in Bahir Dar demonstrated significant gains, including:

- Increases in household savings, a new behavior for 84% of families.
- Shifts to new, or more reliable and profitable, sources of income.
- Lower school dropout and grade repetition rates, and higher promotion rates, than other students at the same schools.
- Widespread engagement and support from a strengthened network of service providers.

This work cannot be done in isolation. The enclosed publication underscores the power of partnership among key stakeholders including government officials, community-based organizations, and public school educators.

I invite you to join us: share your own experiences, support programming to address poverty for vulnerable families in Ethiopia, or connect with SOS Children’s Villages to learn more.

Sincerely,

Walter Panzirer
